noel

fifteen, in love for the first time, you've just said goodnight, hugged, kissed, hands entwined, the back of your fingers touched her cheek.
walking the close, clean blocks toward home, it's dark, late, end of october,
the crisp air in your lungs,
it feels like life itself. without concern for what eyes
might be watching, you jump, touch a brown leaf
on a tree limb. full of joy,
you begin to run, the air
on your face, ears turning red, nose icy numb... you never would have guessed,
all the years left to come,
and nothing in any of them
would ever be quite so perfect as that moment

James Bertolino

A Kitten's Chance

When the computer is your only friend,
and the more your fingers move

the less ground you cover, there may be help for you. Don't press hard bones into your eyes.

Don't pry your hinges loose. There's a bridge near your neighborhood where something deep opens and invites you in. Sure you'll come out thinner, but your mind will arch like a kitten into the galactic petting hand, you'll lick

the sweet raw milk of the universe.

James Bertolino

Salamander Eyes

The ceiling fan sliced ghosts drawn to see the baby's eyes.

They looked like screaming,
like flaming tires.

In confusion the family lifted rocks,
seeking answers small and convenient to the hand.

The ravens insisted the wrong questions were being asked.

Too late for Dad when they found him praying to her shoelace.

Even her zoo cookies tasted
of dark sugars.

Alice Cullina

The Questions

Eventually I stopped painting heat.
It is the only way to stop the asking of questions.
They are discernable—like rain in darkness—
and it is worse here where the wind blows so often, sifting them apart. The questions have forgotten heat and yet they remember how to speak. Once when I forgot the screen, three came into my room. They had nothing like the bird testing the walls with a force.
They were nearly as dangerous, shifting, wrestling, trying to taste me. One touched my face. It felt like falling asleep in public, or like a stillness.

Alice Cullina

Saint Laurence

I was small when we hollowed the cliffs. Cliffs like these are salted and languid, and they sometimes drop near our heads. The seagulls watch them without disdain, as if they watched children in a yard. On the beach we found a dead seal but it didn't know. It sat at our bonfire beside a small cup of grape juice and it changed shapes with its hollow. We did not bury it. In two years it was gone. We were not yet gone, we were like the reeds in a childhood drama, ready and soft.

Sometimes my aunt marched and sometimes we held our knees with our fingers, cold. Today we found an oval of grass growing in the ocean. It is greener and thick with the urgency.

Jaimie Gusman

Still life with John Allyn Smith

How many habits do I have to give up before I'm healthy and boring?
I thought I had until at least 25
before starting to count everything
under a patch of grass
where nobody's missing.
After Wilma passed
I had a breast exam
where a nurse discovered my heart
murmured like a celebration.
I felt awfully confused
about my anatomy when I left.
What could Berryman have thought was worse than ice-hockey
or a doctor's appointment?
If I were machine,
I would malfunction during an EKG.
I would update myself.
Do you ever feel that way?
like you would say yes to anything that could read you better than a word?

Jaimie Gusman

Still life with Nancy Kerrigan

Hello to the mad heart and the messy heart.
Hello to the magi and their money aching hats.
Hello to the magic of combing your hair.
Hello to the marker for this way up and east.
Hello to the masters of vaginal arousal.
Hello to the mate of the boat and the wind.
Hello to the means to the end of an end.
Hello to the menstruating pig and her ears.
Hello to the milk setting the world down.
Hello to the missing, to the impending impulses.
Hello to the mockery with this horse on mute.
Hello to the modernicide and motorcycle clans.
Hello to the monkeys and the invention of meat.
Hello to the moon as a knock on the door.
Hello to the moors of an animal's dreaming.
Hello to the mortuary and the birth canal.
Hello to the multiplication of my mother's eyes.
Hello to the music of Brain and Soul and Bark.
Hello to the mysterious cold gaps in this window.

Chera Hodges

The Pictures Are On A Tilt

The pictures are on a tilt, shaken by wind, a hand that came in under the door, teased the fire, and scattered papers. Van Gogh lost his mother, his ear, and finally his balance on my wall.

Drops of stars gather in the corner of the frame, catch on the cathedral, slide off mountains and the tops of houses, leave ripples around their empty spaces.
Midnight pushes forward, black. The villagers do not feel the valley spinning, do not see it, but hear it creak.
The ground falls up, the buildings tremble, lights jump
to life in the sanctuary; stained glass blocks the cracking roads, turns the world outside into Virgin Mary blue.

The left side needs only a lift, the right perhaps a lowering, and all of it an extra nail to keep it from rocking again. Just that.
It is not unwhole. But it lacks realization; it is a house forgetting
The holes in the old plaster, the water-stain on the ceiling;
Pale shed skin of a snake left on green lawn.
And then, too, windows are not doors.

Stars slide down the bell-tower, drip from trees, surrender for nothing.
They leave no face, not a footprint or shadow.
They are not recognition, reflection, or alarm.
Only the small frightened voices of a village routine.

When all has melted, no gaps appear. Things are not unwhole.
Only, sinking, stars watch traces of themselves disappear behind them,
A sort of comet: faces of an imaginary congregation in an oil church lit by moon; a painting, in a narrow frame, sliding out.

Chera Hodges

To Matthew

I remember naming you. You would be someone else except the sound of it did not fit.
You were notes on the back of a photograph,
written down, not keeping shape with many fingers.
The rhyme was lost with every voice touching you;
your edges cracked until concern was cut away.
The silent square of the mirror
shows only the colorless black of eyes,
that void inside the television which no one has turned on—a flicker of scales, a rippling speaks of making forts out of pine needles,
the summer we got snow cones every night,
how you shot a sparrow with a pellet gun
and cried when you found that the clouds had dropped it,
and would not reach for it, and things have blood.
I can see, when the sun slides through trees,
the way I never let you gather the almost-ripe tomatoes.
Or someday I will say, nothing is surfacing,
but when do I walk away?

My hands remember porcelain birds,
the smooth white windowsill;
the place in your hair you almost never outgrew;
that piece of clear that kept everything in—

Robert Jacoby

My mind's a cathedral, exploded in

My mind's a cathedral, exploded in Kaleidoscopic sun-stained glass
Blood splinters, nerved and lead-veined Ruinous bones' veneer
Of bleeding figurines, cloaked guilt
Whispered memory lingered under skin of water
Fragrant incense smokes significant Sip the blessed nectar!
A thousand risen Christs shall shine
Exquisite solace of the sun
A thousand silent Christs burn
So Sing! choirs of doomed gods
Out of time and out of grace
Mount the quick altar crest!
Time's teller parses bone from marrow and
My gargoyles inform me in my empty tomb:
The wisdom tree's roots remain

Robert Jacoby

The Reverse Funeral

Start at the empty tomb and rewind time

if you can.
Undo your dead.
Undo the dead and all their ghosts,
legion.

Do you dare call them from their tombs?

Unravel,

unearth
their mysteries,
their stuff of life.

What went wrong in the garden?
Why do you bleed?

Talk with your dead
Speak with your dead
Until you come screaming
out of them
back to you.

And know that not
all want to be raised
or need to be.
Some have had enough.
The dead roam the earth
sprung from rocks.

Our steps to the grave are watched over silently.
Leave the graveyard while you can.

Thomas David Lisk

Blisters

The blisters broke. Everything around the heart pine looked dirty.
A letter addressed key issues, but the key never fit the lock.
Issue-thin it was so hard it turned against the tumblers.

After the door opened, we wondered why it was unlocked,
while other key observers looked beyond the opening
and saw deficiencies in the maple floor, the surface,

which, as far as we could tell, was perfectly sound, though betrayals are everywhere you look, if you look in the right places.
It should, however, be easy to look away, at trees, at cloud shadows, unblinded windows,

the pack of snarling dogs
running toward you from the other side of the parabola.

Thomas David Lisk

Intelligence is a Miracle of Desire

1.

They came to the good city, she on a bicycle and he in stranger's shoes, seeking silk, salt sauce, plantains, and many foot-bound volumes.

They met in an urban library, where she had made long tunnels and he had visited or flown over.

She loved her teacher, whose name was tongue/ tongue/ tongue/ in a different tongue.

He liked to, for juxtaposition and a change of state, think of mangos.

2.

They made love on the yellow linoleum of an apartment he never visited.

He thought it was love.

She never said.

The room was full of black and orange silk dragons woven under mulberry trees in some gone dynasty or khanate.

Paris was a glossy black caution sign.

3.

The first time they met she could hardly see over the wall.

The first time they met in earnest he smelled foreign.

She couldn't breathe, but that wasn't the reason.

Would you pour a silk-black cat down your throat?

Prowling joy was sleek, was black, transcendent.

The day she left, she laughed near nervous tears and poked him twice on the arm.

He thought, I am your dog, greet you with leaps.

Their tongues touched, though they never touched.

Iain Macdonald

Alongside the Dumpster

Today, a pair of snow boots
in surprisingly good shape;
yesterday, a mattress
with the usual suspicious staining.

Every day, it seems someone from the apartments
leaves something for someone else to glean.

Furniture shows up most-- drunken bookshelves and the like,
but discarded electronics--
computers and their parts,
come close behind.

Some objects beg questions.

Who, for example, abandoned
the deflated "pleasure doll"?
And who, God help us,
picked it up?

Why did someone
paint all those watercolors
only to leave them
bleeding in the rain?

And as for the child
whose neatly folded T-shirts and dresses
sit stacked beside the trash--
where is she now?
Whatever in this world
has become of her?

Iain Macdonald

History Lesson

When our dog died,
I dug her grave
with pick and shovel;
even through leather gloves
my hands blistered,
then bled.

Now,
fresh grass conceals
the upturned earth,
unblemished flesh
denies the wound.

Again and again,
memory persists
as bones within the soil,
scars beneath the skin.

Michael K. Meyers

Telling Everything

I took the child up in my talons. Do not be alarmed, I said, you are in no danger. By then we were at a considerable height. Look down, I said, go ahead. When he had I directed his attention to points of interest passing below. There was much to tell, to explain, but we had time and so I told him everything.

This Is Sweden

Fred and Ellen have rented a cottage beside a small lake in—is it in Wisconsin, or is it in Minnesota? Or, a third thought, Sweden. Why not Sweden? Both look around. This is what Ellen thinks; It is because of the cottage, the design of the windows, the line of the roof, or—and this is Fred's thought—perhaps it is because of the auto that we have arrived in? Both turn look at the auto parked beside cottage, beside lake and think, could be, perhaps is Swedish car. Then for sure, both agree, feel confident in saying aloud, know for sure, this is Sweden. We are—spoken words gushing and speaking together—we are in Sweden. And maybe they are. You are somewhere else. You are not responsible. None of this is your fault.

Nancy Wing

Facts of Death

Into his perfect death
my father grows,
shrinking smaller
into his narrow frame
of bones.

Within the crucible of dying
his blood turns slowly
into clear translucence
until at last,
self embalmed and cleaned,
he meets the living flame;

The junkyard
of his fragile bones
curling back
into his last becoming.

These are the facts
of death.

What's left for us
the living
is a ceremony
of emptiness.

On the green sward
of a sloping hill
below the birdsong trees
we come
to bury ashes
and an urn.

Above the mound of earth
covering his absence
a small white butterfly
hovers fluttering its wings
and rises.

A bird sings on.

Nancy Wing

Somewhere in Between

Grandfather is dying in his room
I cannot see him until he is dead
I am eight or nine years old
I hear them say he broke his hip long after, my mother would keep his sterling silver cigar case
with its dent where he fell

When we go to see him, he is lying on a long narrow bed. His pale fingers hold a rose on his chest.
His nails are clean and neat. He is dead.
His hair is soft and silky. His beard is very trim around his mouth. Where did he go? I only knew him a little when he gave me life savers from an inlaid box and in my nervousness I swallowed one whole and it hurt until it melted.

Gerald Yelle

Afternoon in Afterlife

And I know before waking each wave of tenderness the baby gives access to, paths

like velvet on evening's adolescence,
a town like Rising Sun limning the West.

And here a hearth in the glow of a restful interior.

And here a soft place for landing.

I cradle my cargo, my baby, so big in my arms
I can't see my wingtips. It's the same with taking off:

Never anything solid to push away from and still you glide.

I leap from the rafters in the market

in mid-afternoon and business is so brisk nobody notices

when I lean and let go.

It's their new specialty garners attention:

a thin bundle bound at one end,

a morbid shock of human hair coyly

christened the fashion fetch.

More fetish than fashion, I might add, speaking as one who owns many.

I only wear a T-shirt, a pair of shorts ready to hand
in case someone tries to stop me.

One cop scratching parking tickets won't:

and the shock dangling from his rearview

corroborates my confidence.

Like the day's final run, full of land-grab, full of fishing holes and couples,

full of picnic ground and fairground,

hairless head of the cowpoke I've been dogging,

all shank legs and big charisma.

Small tin soldier from where I sit.

Everything I want I assimilate: every upbraid, every sigh, each heavy-lidded languish of chicanery.

No qualms invoking pity to cadge tobacco, stroll my baby, break my will.

No Different Than Crows

Birds are like weather: Once gone, it's hard to tell where they were. One cardinal tripped the wire and so it was recorded, though none of this is verifiable. Like a physical attentiveness clotted by veins, this attempt to limber the neck, this strain after the mouthful running from the fountain. Crows' diet leaves nothing to boast of--though it keeps feathers well-oiled and shiny. They might charcoal their beaks or pick the webs off their wings. Critics say they're clumsy: they ought to peel back the onion. What grace they manage they abandon as soon as they come to the table where they encounter their betters, opposable thumbs, live from their mothers and cold. Their very breath deprives others of their livelihood. Crows know this and suffer, preferring whirligigs, canaries, the Fourth of July white noise whistling of the troops.

About

James Bertolino is a past Writer In Residence at Willamette University in Oregon and is now retired. His work has appeared in Beloit Poetry Journal, Indiana Review, Notre Dame Review, Ploughshares, Prairie Schooner, and other magazines; and anthologized internationally—including in Century: 100 Major Modern Poets.

Alice Cullina received her BA in English from Harvard University, where she wrote a book-length collection of poetry for her Honors thesis. She lives in New York City.

Jaimie Gusman lives in Seattle where she validates data and builds artful things from collapsed filing cabinets. Her work has been published or is forthcoming in Diagram, Margins Magazine, and Permafrost.

Chera Hodges lives in Laguna, New Mexico. She has successfully competed in the Texas Association of Creative Writing Teachers Annual Competition, and Frontiers in Writing. Her poetry appears or is scheduled to appear in The Cherry Blossom Review and Paradidomi Review.

Robert Jacoby lives in Maryland. The two poems here in 2RV are from Stars Fall Nude, currently seeking a publisher. Excerpts from Escaping from Reality Without Really Trying: 40 Years of High Seas Travels and Lowbrow Tales—a memoir-by-interview of a 61-year-old, life-long merchant seaman, also seeking a publisher—appear in Alice Blue Review and Oregon Literary Review.

Thomas David Lisk teaches American Literature and sometimes Journalism at North Carolina State University. His work has appeared in Bat City Review, Hotel Amerika, Massachusetts Review, and Town Creek. His newest books are These Beautiful Limits (Parlor Press, 2006) and Tentative List (a) (Kitchen Press Chapbooks, 2008).

Iain Macdonald, born and raised in Glasgow, Scotland, has earned his bread and beer in various ways--from tree climbing to seafaring. He currently lives in northern California, where he works as a high school English teacher.

Michael K. Meyers teaches at the School of the Art Institute in Chicago. His fiction and audio work have appeared in Chelsea, Chicago Noir, Fiction, Fringe, Mad Hatter, The New Yorker, Quick Fiction, and Word Riot. A video piece can be viewed at 9th Letter. His CD of flash fictions is Once Again Doctor Freud's Horse Has Gone Missing.

Nancy J. Wing has been writing poems for more than 50 years. She has appeared in literary journals, is a winner of first prize from the Poetry Society of Virginia, and has self-published Calling From The Seed.

Gerald Yelle teaches high school English. Poems of his are published or forthcoming in Argestes, Main Channel Voices, Main Street Rag, and Pinyon.
