

2RV

16.2 (Winter 2012)

The 2River View

16.2 (Winter 2012)

2River

www.2River.org

7474 Drexel DR • University City • MO • 63130 • USA

New Poems by Bonnie Arning, Caitlin Jackson, Judy Katz-Levine
John McKernan, Andrea Mehaffie, Adam Peltz, Bertha Rogers
Robin Scofield, James Valvis, Jason M. Vaughn, Tracy Youngblom

The 2River View, 16.2 (Winter 2012)

About the Photographer

Brent Pallas lives and works in New York City as a craft and home decor designer.

About 2River

Since 1996, 2River has been a site of poetry and art, quarterly publishing The 2River View, occasionally publishing individual authors in the 2River Chapbook Series.

Richard Long, Editor
2River
www.2River.org

The 2River View

16.2 (Winter 2012)

The 2River View, 16.2 (Winter 2012)

Contents

Jason M. Vaughn
First Snow

Bonnie Arning
Death Long Distance

On all the nights you leave me a spider crawls into my head

Caitlin Jackson
Awash

First Response Negative

Judy Katz-Levine
Afternoon Parable
With Dignity

photograph by Brent Pallas

Press. His most recent book is Resurrection of the Dust.

Andrea Mehaffie recently graduated from the University of Tampa with a degree in writing. Her work here at 2River is her first publication.

Adam Peltz lives with his wife Ashley Miner and their cats in New Orleans. His publishing credits include work in A Bad Penny, Literary Magazine Review, NOLAFugees, and Platte Valley Review.

Bertha Rogers is the author of Heart Turned Back (Salmon Poetry). Her translation of Beowulf was published in 2000; and her translation of the Anglo-Saxon Riddle-Poems is forthcoming.

Robin Scofield is the author of And the Ass Saw the Angel and the forthcoming Sunflower Cantos. Other poems appear in The Mas Tequila Review, New Border Writing: A Still Life in Words, and The Warwick Review.

James Valvis is the author of How to Say Goodbye (Aortic Books, 2011). Other poems appear in Anderbo, Arts & Letters, Midwest Quarterly, New York Quarterly, Poetry East, Rattle, River Styx, and Verse Daily.

Jason M. Vaughn has published, or has poems forthcoming, in Big Muddy, I-70 Review, Green Hills Literary Lantern, The Little Balkans Review, and The Same.

Tracy Youngblom is the author of Driving to Heaven (Parallel Press, 2010). New poems are forthcoming in New York Quarterly, Ruminate, and Weave Magazine.

The 2River View, 16.2 (Winter 2012)

Contributors

Bonnie Arning is pursuing an MFA in poetry from the University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, where she is the managing editor of The Blue Mesa Review.

Caitlin Jackson works as a technical writer in Orlando, Florida, and is also pursuing her MFA in Creative Writing at the University of Central Florida.

Judy Katz-Levine is the author of When The Arms Of Our Dreams Embrace (Saru 1991), Ocarina (Saru 2006), and When Performers Swim, The Dice Are Cast (Ahadada 2009).

John McKernan has retired as a comma herder after teaching 41 years at Marshall University, where he continues to edit ABZ

John McKernan
I Am Here for the Day in Subiaco, Arkansas
My Greatest Crimes

Andrea Mehaffie
Fast Enough
If I Knew You Were There

Adam Peltz
Winter, New York City, 1893
Ash Wednesday, New Orleans

Bertha Rogers
Old January
Winter Trip

Robin Scofield
Maelstrom
To My Mother's Backbone

James Valvis
The Philosophies of Loneliness

Tracy Youngblom
To the Dark Barn
At the Chicken Cemetery

photograph by Brent Pallas

At eight, I am as conscientious as my grandmother, whose praise I will wait for all day, whose image I can't blink out of mind: she'd catch each chicken in the yard, bundle its gnarled feet in one strong hand, then talk to it in the same voice she used telling stories at night, The Little Red Hen,

The Bremen Town Musicians. And just as I did on the pillow, each bird lay down its head without protest on the block, closed its eyes and failed to see what was coming with such speed and force. She does not waste anything, I think. The dogs have probably eaten all the chicken heads by now.

Tracy Youngblom

At the Chicken Cemetery

One at a time, their heads fly off. Bodies leap then spasm to stillness, flattening the grass. For gravestones, clumps of tall grass doused in blood. Does it ever pass from red to rust? No one tells me. Feet held, they're dunked in a tank of boiling water, the cord of the electric heater snaking toward the barn.

We all pluck them, wet feathers sticking to our hands and shaken to the grass, white peonies soaked by rain.

Inside, the singeing and gutting: slurp and suck of entrails that shake the table as the women agree, Forty birds is a good day's work.

I stand at the sink, accept what I am allowed to handle—gizzards I slice along the seam without piercing the crop. Giblets for stuffing.

I pare carefully around each globe as if it were a peach, parting it, hips pressed to the drain board, refusing to be tired.

Jason M. Vaughn

First Snow

Its fledglings fell almost invisibly, so light as to sometimes be drifting up or traveling virtually motionless like hay motes through a barn stall.

The next moment it was dropping in clusters as ample as autumn leaves that had a mind to smother the world but only hushed it and then expired, having furred the dark humps of our cudding Black Baldy cattle and in the process drawn something of those congregated forms out of the dusk for us, as well as etched the barn's great peak from the sky so we might look with less fear into this and every darkness.

James Valvis

The Philosophies of Loneliness

1. Western

Nothing matters. Except your eyes.
They might matter. No, nothing matters.
Except your lips. They might.
Nothing matters except your legs, but when I see your breasts your legs don't matter. Nothing matters.
I think, therefore I am not with you.
It doesn't matter that I think.
It doesn't matter what I think.
God is dead. Therefore, I am God.
Therefore, I am dead.
It doesn't matter. It doesn't matter to you.
You are God.
You matter.

2. Eastern

Life is suffering.
The Way comes and goes.
You come and go. Away. A Way.
A way I don't understand.
I don't understand away.
All suffering arises from attachment.
All attachment arises and goes away.
The one gave birth to the two.
The two gave birth to the none.
The none gave birth to me.
I am one of the ten thousand things.
You are the nine thousand-nine hundred-ninety-nine.
You are my suffering.
You are my way.

Bonnie Arning

On all the nights you leave me a spider crawls into my head legs fat as fingers, a bloated body swathed in fur; my own night priest bristling in a thread-black gown. My doctor says every milk black eye hole—a simple misfiring of neurons, my doctor says, if you want to be cured accept the spider is with you all the time; when he might have said, accept your husband leaves you to the dark with a moon crumpled small and a jagged sizzle as the streetlamp, that once lit your window, shorts, explodes sparks and glass—such a dangerous night confetti. So I bite my pillows and I scratch my face and when I wake the bed sheets are patterned with swirls of my own blood. My mother once advised, if you're afraid of something deep inside—you'll see it; so I imagine the spider weaves a web of constellations, that she's a mother tending a nest of sweet clear children. I study her anatomy until she seems human, cling to the vulnerable image of blood easing through the slits that line her fragile thumbnail heart.

Caitlin Jackson

Awash

I
To step out into it from the shower-- not neat lines of small round capsules but fist mashes of blue, white, yellow.

And to lie down when it's over,
Feel the salt slap of rearing, snorting waves. Feel the comfort of the ending of a book read once.

Long skirts dragging,
then nothing but sea.
Feel sluggish hope pried free and that warm watery taste of approaching, of far off final peace.

II

Now you call.

Insistent songs. First like sirens, crashing over something out of slept-through cassette tapes.

Then sharp. Nothingness split. And after curled up crunched air gasp out the shame sting of salvation is what is left. Entire oceans drained away.

Long since fled.

Robin Scofield

To my Mother's Backbone

I would not tell you I would not even if your cobweb mind could trap the other story of how your curses hurt me a cockroach flying at you an unwanted transmission a vibration your spider heart cannot trace no I would not tell you even though you asked me once and I thought to but then again what good would come of it when you have shrunk in all ways feeble as a late autumn fly dragging a dead leg behind you at the decayed temple where what's deaf as snakes cannot pray

Robin Scofield

Maelstrom

An obsessed lover lives in the crawl space beneath the house where the object of her desire resides.
She taps the phone, working with a flashlight in her teeth, canceling appointments and erasing messages.
The woman above is sure she has a family of possums, and the woman down there has hair like a rat's nest.

Both have wavy hair like Medusa.
Both are afraid of the wrong thing.
The frontal lobes above the hearth make us feel safe that we are not that hidden woman, sleeping with scorpions, whose governor has resigned.

We may ignore what thrives below the floor:

the boxes full of wires, the white crickets, the snakes at a level so low we have forgotten we stay there too in the dirt of our unreturned love.

Caitlin Jackson

First Response Negative

I'll admit, for a week I hoped rather than dreaded. Listened for ghost heartbeats with my head cocked.

No one cooed on crowded busses or pressed ear to belly button.
My feet braced for planetary shifts.

And my tongue came loose to tell you the news-scrambling upward like life clawing its way to light.

And I could see the mouth open, agape in yawn and scream.

Yet longing was all there was of this sinewy bridge to you, thumping on the air with fists that look like yours.

Judy Katz-Levine

Afternoon Parable

They have a strange and beautiful relationship. Here, have some tea. The hydrangeas in bloom in the dusk. Her son was afflicted with cancer. The cabbage soup goes down well. The relationship between the two lovers ascended like a Monarch butterfly. They exchanged words limned with rye grass. They have a covenant. Here, turn on this lamp. The phone call was far more than they expected. Laced with parables of French horns and oboes. The curtain came down on the boy with cancer, then lifted up for a soccer ball's ascent in the mist.

Bertha Rogers

Winter Trip

Her car—she no longer controls its mass—slides across the road, ice directing precarious journey. Wait, she pleads, in the blue dark, wait, I had in mind to drive north, not west. But the aroused vehicle continues—steadfastly determinist, yet slowly enough that she will not perish—not this time—in the utterly dark ditch. Her fingers lightly grip—Like this? she thinks—the wheel, learning what she knew—that brakes won't do, not tonight—steer the wheel toward the slant, relieved to be relieved of accountability. And there, facing the minor abyss, she waits for the truck that will come; unfinish her.

Bertha Rogers

Old January

Out of somewhere we don't know comes less than zero. This shrouded hour is so cold that coyotes quiet among the Cimmerian spruces they call home; mountains crack open.
This is how it ends—world warmed, wrought so by our hectic hands; ice born of hordes; inside-out weather. The spent planet freezes bodies off its grated curves while they sleep.
It's four in the morning; this day will fall further, then ordain a swathed sun. All feathers will shiver and stiffen, all song will cease. We protest; we have done no wrong.

Judy Katz-Levine

With Dignity

I could dignify this response with the way we are polite to each other when times are hard. newspapers fly off like starlings. the seer in me wants a back pocket. the prophet in me wants a sunrise over a moth orchid. I'll take my spare change and ride with you. sometime.
I'll be doing that cascada dance. you'll be listening at the kitchen table, and I'll be taking you in. arms spread open.
the exquisite voice of the lilac is almost more than I can stand, but I take her in anyway. I'll be reading my poems in the streets, you'll see.

John McKernan

I Am Here for the Day in Subiaco, Arkansas

In the graveyard where Frank Stanford Has been for a long time

This is where he designed the shield
For Jean Cocteau to wear In Frank's unfinished silent film Our Sun

Down the grassy dirt road
Across the lane
From the Academy
And the Benedictine Monastery

A beautiful young woman Has pedaled her bicycle to the edge Stands Then kneels for a half hour Beside what seems the newest grave Praying the gold rosary in her hands

She is crying
Mounds of thick flowers
Still fragrant in the warm air
There are golf balls everywhere here I like that she is praying
On the outside And also On the inside

Adam Peltz

Ash Wednesday, New Orleans

In my northern childhood—the precious moments' porcelain faces, falsehoods stored in china cabinets beside plastic-coated sofas, urns, photos of matriarchs and saints, though no dreadlocked Jesus—

my delinquent hometown:
Stories where some of the kids sacrificed cats next to the highway in the only rugged terrain left in that world.

Most of us went to the beach, nine miles south, a couple of us swam in the runoff ditch with the rats and pesticides.
Bubonic silt grazed our thighs.

Today, at dawn I rise, a man in a red necktie chosen to match my eye-whites; but I watched the Carnival closedown and this morning I swallowed the whole body of the RTA's exhaust at the I-10's mouth.

I pedaled past the thousands of shimmering hong kong beads. No one, nothing parted the way on this wretched day.

Adam Peltz

Winter, New York City, 1893

after Israel Kasovich

The kettle rattles in an East Side kitchen where I look out among rooftops and listen: Coaches' bells, their tempered cries, wail up to belittle grandmother's staccato and slur of her accordian. Where once a kaiserman and troika slipped over tundra, now a peddler with his pushcart bears into the golden streets: How many versts will he walk through frozen memory?—for Little Pereshtchepina has fallen and all the wheat is gone. Like borscht boiling the uprooting came quick; the village was left behind.
It is strange here, this cold mixture heating slowly as the beets cook down the old world.
I can almost make out woodsmoke, the granary, the dawn steppes, tracks trailing away....

John McKernan

My Greatest Crimes

Were at the Walt Whitman Birthplace Near Huntington Long Island

Where I walked impudently across the lawn
With its large sign
DO NOT WALK ON THE GRASS

Where I ignored the small warning
DO NOT ENTER
In front of a shed
Full of hand tools & power mowers

Inside which lay chunks
In cool sunlight
Of bright green sod
One of which I snatched
And stashed in the trunk of my car

All of which I planted
At different places
Around my yard here
In West Virginia
Driving away I stopped my car
And picked bunches

Of dandelions beside the road
If I had seen a lilac shrub anywhere I would have ripped it from the earth with my bare hands

Andrea Mehaffie

Fast Enough

He pulled my tooth that day.
It loosened on an apple
I picked from his tree.
With fingers hidden under a damp washcloth, he pulled it away.

He held it in his hand
as I ran my tongue through the space.
It felt known, though I had never felt that part of me.

Make a wish, he said because wishes were better than quarters under pillows.

I wished to have more teeth to pull,
to see his face that close to mine.

I can still see it, bark of a willow tree melded into cheek and chin.
His eyes, scotch and water, resting on my face.

I couldn't help but love
the blood that flowed from my mouth.
Warm and soft,
a river that only rushes.

Andrea Mehaffie

If I Knew You Were There

The stuff of magic he used to say, as if magic could be found somewhere, could be a stuff.
I used to stare at those two-yellowed fingers thinking that was where the magic was, his magic.
The smoke always did surround him, blurring the wrinkles around his eyes.

I would watch him as if he was my magic, as if those dollars he gave me came from smoky stars.
I'd watch, as he would rub his leather wallet, so soft I thought it might dissolve. Leaving the bills folded neatly beneath change and plastic.
It never did dissolve. It probably has now.

When people die we are afraid of the bones, the puzzle pieces that made the smile we miss.
If I ever saw his bones I would hug them, those crooked kneecaps, the yellow finger bones, And I would remember the magic and the smoke that filled the convertible we sat in for a while.