

2RV

23.4 (Summer 2019)

The 2River View

23.4 (Summer 2019)

Hollywood Beach, Florida, and Palms © 2019 by Jan Matson

2River

www.2River.org

7474 Drexel DR • University City • MO • 63130 • USA

new poems by

Bree A. Rolfe, Ishanee Chanda

Harley Anastasia Chapman, Charles Finn

Susan L. Leary, Cameron Morse

Sarah A. Sousa, Travis Stephens

Taylor D. Waring, Richard Weaver

The 2River View, 23.4 (Summer 2019)

The 2River View

23.4 (Summer 2019)

About 2River

Since 1996, 2River has been a site of poetry and art, quarterly publishing The 2River View and occasionally publishing individual authors in the 2River Chapbook Series. 2River is also the home of Muddy Bank, the 2River blog.

Richard Long
2River

ISSN 1536-2086
www.2River.org
www.muddybank.org www.facebook.com/2RiverPoetry 2river.tumblr.com
twitter.com/2weetRiver \(@2weetRiver\)

The 2River View, 23.4 (Summer 2019)

Contents

- Bree A. Rolfe
A litany of bad decisions
- Ishanee Chanda
The Journey to the Center of the Earth
Mirror
- Harley Anastasia Chapman
Hawkmother
Life Study
- Charles Finn
Morning Coffee
Somewhere

Cameron Morse is the author of Fall Risk, won Glass Lyre Press's 2018 Best Book Award, and Father Me Again (Spartan Press). The chapbook Coming Home with Cancer is forthcoming from Blue Lyra Press.

Bree A. Rolfe has appeared in 5AM, Chorus: A Literary Mixtape, and Redpaint Hill Anthology Mother is a Verb.

Sarah Sousa is the author of See the Wolf, Split the Crow and Church of Needles and of the chapbook Yell. Her poems have appeared in the North American Review, the Southern Poetry Review, and Tupelo Quarterly, among others. She is on the board of directors of Perugia Press.

Travis Stephens is a sea captain who resides in California. Recent credits include Apeiron Review, Cirque, Crosswinds Poetry Journal, Dead Mule School of Southern Literature, Gravitas, Southword, Stoneboat Review, and Tiny Seed Literary Journal.

Taylor D. Waring plays in the psychedelic sludge band Merlock. Waring is also the Managing Editor of Willow Springs Books.

Richard Weaver is the author of The Stars Undone (Duende Press). His poems here in 2River are from a collection based on the final words of famous people, some of which have appeared in Adelaide, After the Pause, and Loch Raven Review.

Color of Summer © 2019 by Jan Watson

The 2River View, 23.4 (Summer 2019)

About the Authors

Ishanee Chanda is a prose writer and poet with publications in a number of journals. She has also written two books of poetry: Oh, these walls, they crumble and The Overflow.

Harley Anastasia Chapman has appeared or is forthcoming in Columbia Poetry Review, Euphemism, Not Very Quiet, Soundings East, and Storyscape Journal, Charles Finn is the editor of the literary and fine arts magazine High Desert Journal and author of Wild Delicate Seconds: 29 Wildlife Encounters (OSU Press 2012).

Susan L. Leary has appeared in journals such as The Christian Century, Gone Lawn, and Into the Void. Her chapbook This Girl, Your Disciple is forthcoming from Finishing Line Press.

Susan L. Leary
My Brother Can Say Some of the Prettiest Things
The Cleanest Sheet of Ice

Cameron Morse
Mississippi Singalong
Trespassing

Sarah Sousa
The Other World
Witch

Travis Stephens
Traffic Report

Taylor D. Waring
a snowman to abduct me
a snowman to warm me

Richard Weaver
Hunter S. Thompson
Seamus Heaney

A Walk in the Sun © 2019 by Jan Matson

Seamus Heaney

The moment appears, unannounced, though I sensed its approach, and felt its hand take mine. You too will know this comfort upon exit. I grow larger as time collapses. Your presence, everywhere in the room, outside, and beyond. Filling my heart. My lungs.

Becoming the blood I was and am now unbecoming. "Do not be afraid."

Richard Weaver

Hunter S. Thompson

I may have been, in my own words, a tortured man for all seasons, but it's infuriating to die. Not that it's unexpected. Or even inconvenient. It's just a pisser.

As Dylan sang, an idiot wind. Not gonzo. Although I was supremely pissed at my wife (now ex) at the time. Still, death it is, and dead I must be. So, Owl farm is available. I live there after all. And worse, football season is over. For me and that lovable fart Nixon. I know he evacuated earlier. Work with me here. OK?

I'm dying. Remember? Tortured as well. I won't explain shit, especially the last thing I wrote. One word: counselor. According to no less an authority than The Rolling Stone, who kindly published what they thought was my obit, my last words were – "Relax. It won't hurt". You empty a gun into your head and see if that makes sense?

Hell, having my ashes blasted out of a cannon over Woody Creek canyon was a walk in the goddam park.

Bree A. Rolfe

A litany of bad decisions

Part One: Omens

The only remaining correspondence between the two of us— a New York Times article about Marfa and a reply of yippee.

Jon Krakauer's Under the Banner of Heaven on audiobook— Mormonism, blood atonement a six hour drive through desert.

The first gallery with photographs of Katrina's destruction paired with poems from children left in her wake. Something beautiful repurposed from storm but still destruction.

Bree A. Rolfe

Part Two: Take it All Back, Take it All Back

Some farm-to-table restaurant with a name that involved chicken and electricity where you bring your own wine.
A loud table of sophisticated middle-aged couples, tipsy and deep, deep in conversation. Us, silent, draining everything we brought.

A bar after, a folk singer on a tour, finishes his set and we talk too long about Club Passim.
All of your drinks on my tab—scotches piled upon scotches.

The couple staying in the apartment next to us: you tell them you're from Brooklyn and I say but you're from Connecticut.
An invitation back to their place for wine that feels like a proposition.

A Milky Way themed air stream trailer that sells grilled cheese—you screaming at me from a bean bag chair, everything misshapen in black light, and so twisted, I walk out and back to our rental alone through pitch-black streets with no real sidewalks.

Taylor D. Waring

a snowman to warm me

his eyes marbled into diamond as i poured his slick remains into a shot glass shaped like a pistol

our heads cocked back & skyward laughing like lamps

i did not know how to thank him for the buzz

as i lit on fire what was left of his face

this is terrible only if you don't know it is always winter on his planet it is always snowing in his head

Taylor D. Waring

a snowman to abduct me

all night the snowman spoke of his moon with an unknown glacial drawl

by dawn i could see the furred corpse of a squirrel emerging from his tinfoil top hat

a rusted antenna & what appeared to be an abandoned alternator blooming behind his copper ribcage

he told me he came from the other side of mars

where it is always winter

i said i understood how it feels to scan the sky with my bones hoping for an alien beacon to call me home

why everyone in the universe is alone

Bree A. Rolfe

Who's going to love the dying girl?

It all unravels: a smashed phone a disconnected call, an overturned coffee table, a locked bathroom, chunks of my hair, unmoored.

Part Three: Aftermath

Triplicates of paperwork.

A gas stop, a guy on a Harley with a sympathetic look and then cheap sunglasses.

A legion of bugs sacrificed on my windshield with no substance in the world other than sheer will to scrub them off.

Six hours to forget:

I'll leave you in a shallow grave in West Texas.

Ishanee Chanda

The Journey to the Center of the Earth

I am digging through this / with empty bowls / and calloused hands / The shovel is cold / and dead / next to me / They say underneath the dirt / the decaying bodies / there is a shattered / broken door / to somewhere / less heavy / On the other side / of the universe / gravity runs the wrong way / It pulls you / into the air / arms above your head / Prayer is done standing / God kneels / at your feet / He must be across / this expanse of death / and rot / and acidity / kneeling on / the other side / I am digging / God / I am coming / I am / burying myself / alive / at your feet

Travis Stephens

From the right a flatbed truck merges bearing a tarp covered load.
I slow to follow.
The tarp is loose in one corner, a black shroud of secrecy.
What could it be?
It could be anything:
an articulated clamshell bucket,
emergency generator, sculpture
for the civic center, a wrecked Bugatti.
Swaying, rocking.
Ohio plates, is that a clue?
Maybe Lebron's trophy collection or the relocated mausoleum of the Bessemer family.
Brake lights.
I go left and let it go, in my rear view mirror an ill-shaped lump of commerce.
Maybe headed your way.
My exit seven minutes away.

Travis Stephens

Traffic Report

today on the highway a shattered pile of wood pieces, jagged sharps amid a tangle of fabric and batting.
I believe it was a couch.
A sofa.
Splattered, shattered and tossed.
Stuffing had become cover & cover had become threads.

Yesterday
on the freeway between exits traffic slowed but didn't stop even as a white van nosed into the guardrail facing traffic, poor thing, billowed smoky flame.
Rain fell as the firemen lit off the hydrant.

Morning traffic abandons dogma & prayer for the solid laws of physics.
The favorite: a body in motion, second best, equal reactions.
Each day a reaffirmation, and too often a lament.
Why oh why me?
Why today?

Ishanee Chanda

Mirror

you pool / in my throat / in the mornings / the taste of your lips / always caught / between my tonsils / and my tongue / it has been months / and i am still / licking you off / my fingertips / like honey / and age-old soaked wine / what if loving someone / is not holding them / in your mouth / when they are gone / i try to swallow / but the words get stuck in my throat / shards of glass / slide into my stomach / they call love the silver death / and i think about the mirror / in your bedroom / all warm wood / and roses / your smile reflected / in the morning light / if this is death / what a glimmer it carries / what a wonderful / graceful / way to go

Harley Anastasia Chapman

Hawkmother

I'm trying to turn my mother into a hawk.
Her coffee is too loud, she prefers wings made of rabbit.
I tell her all the redemptions of the hawk, how he wings gold at sunset how he spots prey for x miles.
She tells me I should brush my hair.
At night I break the bird & put its body limp under her pillow.
By morning she is pink clay.
When her boyfriend comes home water-eyed she is on him, a king's bird.
I watch her clean her teeth as if she has a bone to pick with.

Sarah Sousa

Witch

Wich: a bundle of fiber.
Wik to twine and twist, connected to spinning a hasp, a skein of yarn.
Wik the coiling roots of the tree. Women twisted flax and other plant fiber into wicks, dipped in tallow and burned. The word wicker for willow wand baskets, the word weak meaning flexible stalk, wice for witch hazel's pliant nature.
Wicket, a turning gate. The measured turning of time, a week.
Wicked, the making of knots and plaiting the fibers.
Wicked the conjuring of cloth from beasts. Wich, when the field grass assembles.
Witch when it burns.

Sarah Sousa

The Other World

What is broken here, there is whole. The mirror's bad luck sealed for good along its concentric spider's web of cracks. The head of the doll pushed back onto her body. Synthetic hair, jagged-cut with dull scissors, long again and, oddly, human.
A skull, a vase, an old love mended. Hole in the ice, heart valve, clasp of the necklace.
The razed house reconstructs itself, bone by charred bone, burnishes the empty rooms.
And rivers flow back to their source:
Wet-dark trees. Raindrop at the tip of every leaf reflecting the inverted world like a woman feathered with mirrors.

Harley Anastasia Chapman

Life Study

I have made my life a study of silence, the culmination of your warnings. I hang lilac from the bramble in our backyard, mother, drench the peonies in insecticide.
When their heads hang carpenter bodies fall like snow.
That's what they get, mother.
Don't they know what is ours?
A family of groundhogs have burrowed near, I saw them waddling in a line by the garage.
A mother & three kits.
Do you remember that house you lived in for a summer, how the owner caged the groundhog before he could undermine the front porch?
How the creature clawed against the wire & it was so hot that day, his paws blood-shiny, mouth frothing. We tried to shade him, provide water but we couldn't become things he could trust. I wanted so badly to free him but couldn't bring myself to open the cage door.

Charles Finn

Morning Coffee

They would wake early and carry their morning coffee the porch, the Fabergé rise of the sun theirs for the taking. She'd salute the yellow orb with a tiny bow of her head and he'd raise his mug. Then they'd settle into the wicker rockers that once belonged to her mother. The chairs kept time, they liked to think, with the past and the present. Ritual was everything, and the birds, the morning light, they brought a great calmness. After a while, he'd reach over and take her hand and she knew they were building an architecture of happiness together, one that would never be torn down. Even on the overcast or fog wrapped mornings they sat there, a pair of mute cranes in their bathrobes and slippers. They did this without speaking, listening to the progression of bird song, to the flute-like and chime-filled voices—and it mattered, mattered very much. By the time they finished their coffee, they had heard everything they needed to know.

Cameron Morse

Trespassing

Stray with me. Fasten and fixate.
A wagon wheel leans against the pickets.

Go, investigate.
Investigate the flowerbed, the basketball goals and extension ladders lying on their sides.
These summer houses are mostly empty in December, these gascans, iceboxes, leftover pelts of snow on unraked riverside lawns.
It's unlikely that you will remember this, how you stumbled among the rusty boat trailers in the pre-dawn where I don my coveralls.
It's unlikely you will remember me at all.

What does the water have to say? What does the light have to say to the water? And you, would you please just call me Daddy? I know you know some words.

It's just us out here on the rock bank of the Mississippi. Let me lean over.

Whisper something in my ear.

Cameron Morse

Mississippi Singalong

We wake to the clink of a flagless pole like ice in the bottom of a glass, the clink of the lanyard in the hands of the wind. We walk in the cold.

The willow hangs its leafless vines, light bulb filaments, sun cascading over the cast iron fence.

Whose house is this?
The earth belongs to us, our descendants, earthlings, but the house is not our own. Below it flows the river.

Before which we balk.
The river shuffles its feet, choppy cowboy boots, in its deep blue blouse.
I believe in you.

Even though we're worn out now,
I believe you will always be near me.
Below us, the river carries the river, its tune, its melody.

Charles Finn

Somewhere

She dreams of white swans sitting on dark patches of lake. Hawks, lifted by thermals, pegging themselves to the midday sun. She dreams of grizzly bears making jam in their bellies, and beavers hoarse from shouting when their trees come down. Lying awake in the pre-dawn light she dreams these things, and he can feel her beside him, going deeper and deeper into the animals' lives. Most often she dreams of birds, of an inexplicable pull, of flying south with the moon for weeks on end. She wants this she tells him, how she longs for an uncontrollable ache rather than the one she has. He doesn't say anything, but in the morning he takes her out to the lake where the migrating waterfowl stop over, where they make love, where together they walk, hand in hand, as far and as fast as they can.

Susan L. Leary

The Cleanest Sheet of Ice

Through the cleanest sheet of ice, I watch my brother drowning. He watches as I watch. Both of us hurt by winter—by water & wind & their shared set of teeth. My mouth stuffed shut with the whitest orchids. His eyes paled into the color of snow. This is what addiction will do. Will place your body & the body of the one you love in freezing temperatures & separate them with the cleanest sheet of ice. So clean, my brother & I can almost touch. Almost console one another. The ice ablaze with all that feeling. & how it never stops—not the water rushing, nor the earsplitting sounds of a grown man wailing. The sound of my brother drowning & not knowing how to die.

Susan L. Leary

My Brother Can Say Some of the Prettiest Things

My brother can say some of the prettiest things. Can tell you about the water & the soft smack of the net. About the sound of the line unraveling into the mouth of the finest-looking snapper. All that sweetness in the ear, just for him. How the sound of it barrels into the grit of his blistering palms. In them, the sound of who gets to live.

Like I said, my brother can say some of the prettiest things. My brother, whose hands fidget together like loose puppets across his lap. Who sells food stamps for Roxicodone. Returns to us sporadically & goes unshowered for days. My brother, who leaves in the toilet the basest remnants of a body. His mother, who splits the skin of her fingers to clean it.

But my brother can say some of the prettiest things. Can tell you what evening smells like in the middle of nowhere. The way the lungs open to that scent of stillness between a man & nothing but the earth. All that sky accumulating, just for him. How the smell of it draws near the most hidden parts of night even the stars had forgotten. That now in those stars, something heroic.

Except my brother has no home & no work. My brother, who carries the dirt of an entire city in his beard & pretends he wants to change. You see, my brother can teach the sad irony of people who say the prettiest things. But I can teach you the sadder irony of people who hear them. Like each time in parting, when he tells me he loves me & I believe it.