

2RV

25.4 (Summer 2021)

The 2River View

25.4 (Summer 2021)

Antanacclasis 3 by Sally Van Doren

2River

www.2River.org

704 Tupper ST • Santa Rosa • CA • 95404 • USA

new poems by

Ted Kooser, Matthew Freeman, Will Harmon

Sheree La Puma, Caryn Mirriam-Goldberg, Matthew Murrey

Benjamin Nash, Karen June Olson, Charles Rafferty

SM Stubbs, Diane Thiel, Sally Van Doren

The 2River View, 25.4 (Summer 2021)

About the Artist

Sally Van Doren's lyrical art explores the fertile cognitive territory between word and image. Her collages and polysemic drawings combine her interest in language play and visual art. A polyptoton is the stylistic scheme in which words derived from the same root are repeated (such as "strong" and "strength"), whereas an antanaclassis repeats the same word, but each time with a different sense.

www.sallyvandoren.com Instagram @sallyvandoren

About 2River

Since 1996, 2River has been a site of poetry and art, quarterly publishing The 2River View and occasionally publishing individual authors in the 2River Chapbook Series. 2River is also the home of Muddy Bank, the 2River blog.

Richard Long 2River
www.2River.org
muddybank.org

ISSN 1536-2086

2River on Social Media www.facebook.com/2RiverPoetry www.instagram.com/2RiverPoetry/2River.tumblr.com @2weetRiver

The 2River View

25.4 (Summer 2021)

ISSN 1536-2086

Contributors

Ted Kooser
Ink Black

Matthew Freeman
My First Insight Ever
January Song

Will Harmon
Bubble Bath
Mallory

Sheree La Puma
Something I Hate

Caryn Mirriam-Goldberg
Mystery Streey

Caryn Mirriam-Goldberg served as the Kansas Poet Laureate from 2009 to 2013. She is the author of twenty-four books, including How Time Moves: New & Selected Poems and Needle in the Bone, a non-fiction book on the Holocaust.

Matthew Murrey is a school librarian in Urbana, Illinois. His poems have appeared most recently in JAMA, Okay Donkey, and One. Bulletproof was published in 2019 by Jacar Press.

Benjamin Nash has had poems accepted in Kestrel, Pembroke Magazine, RHINO, VOLT, and elsewhere.

Karen June Olson is a poet and Professor of Early Childhood Education and the author of Living Midair (2River). She lives in a near century home with her husband and two cats.

Charles Rafferty has a collection of prose poems—A Cluster of Noisy Planets—forthcoming from BOA Editions. His poems have appeared in The New Yorker and The Southern Review. Rafferty co-directs the MFA program at Albertus Magnus College.

SM Stubbs is a former co-owner of a bar in Brooklyn, New York. His work has appeared in Carolina Quarterly, Iron Horse Literary Review, New Ohio Review, Poetry Northwest, and elsewhere.

Diane Thiel has published ten books of poetry and nonfiction. Questions from Outer Space is forthcoming from Red Hen Press. Thiel is a Professor at the University of New Mexico, and her awards include PEN, NEA and Fulbright Awards.

Sally Van Doren is an American poet and artist. She has published three collections of poetry, the first of which won the Walt Whitman Award from the Academy of American Poets. Her fourth book, Sibilant, is forthcoming from LSU Press.

Polypoton 5 by Sally Van Doren

The 2River View, 25.4 (Summer 2021)

Contributors

Ted Kooser is a poet, essayist, and Presidential Professor of English at The University of Nebraska—Lincoln. He served as the United States Poet Laureate from 2004 to 2006, and his book Delights & Shadows won the 2005 Pulitzer Prize for poetry.

Matthew Freeman is a poet and songwriter from St. Louis, Missouri. His most recent publications are Ideas of Reference at Jesuit Hall (Coffeetown Press) and the chapbook Exile (2River).

Will Harmon is a poet, philosopher, mountaineer, and undergraduate student at New York University. His work here in 2RV is his first publication.

Sheree La Puma has poems most recently in Chiron Review and Plainsongs. She is the author of two chapbooks: Politics of Love (Ghost City Press) and Broken: Do Not Use (Main Street Rag).

Matthew Murrey
Paradise

Turning Ghost

Benjamin Nash
Agaves
Candle

Karen June Olson
Summer in a Jar
Tapestry

Charles Rafferty
Estate Sale
Oxbows

SM Stubbs
The Ruined
Sister in Absentia

Diane Thiel
Assimilation
Field Notes from the Biolayer

Sally Van Doren
Bargain
Tantric Tinder

Polypoton 6 by Sally Van Doren

as if the sound of her voice filled every inch of the house as if I knew how to value art you will tell me when it costs too much

Tantric Tinder

I discarded the plasma glaze covering my head.
The dump would not accept it in its tainted condition.

I conjured my third chakra to remove the bias against personal protective equipment.

We're at war with a slippery cipher. There's no traction on the ground so I take to the sky.

Airborne, I can see more clearly what's going on through the haze.

The friction between staying put and parting ways heats up the cage we have come to call home. There's a candle inside us and it sets our veins aflame.

Sally Van Doren

Bargain

as if there were people living in my house who knew my name as if the gamble paid off as if the phlegm dislodged itself from the ceiling as if I could breathe in this environment

as if my mind was connected to my throat

as if the page was long enough to advertise my worth

I will pay you whatever you want for it as if the gimmick you use to attract suitors will survive you as if all of us are terrorists seeking to usurp the status quo as if ginger could calm a rioting stomach

as if you swindled me out of my fortune without my knowing it as if he bought her then sold her

Ted Kooser

Ink Black

It was a very bright day, and for miles, August had burned off all the color.
Here and there I could see a farmstead, lifted just slightly above the surface, like the head of a nail working up out of a shingle. Back from the road sat a gray, plank-sided shed with a sheet-metal roof held in place by the smoldering sun.

The fourth wall was open to the south, and if ever there was an "ink black" this was it: anything taken inside had sunk from sight as in a pail of crankcase oil.
All the black in the county was there, dragged up, rolled in, shoved to the back, then more heaped up in front, the last bits pitched on the top to settle in layers dense as coal. If you needed a bucket of black or a length of darkness, this was the place to find it, free. Every shadow for miles was making a bee-line right for that hole.

But then I saw a little faint light from a crack between two of the boards and all the black I'd seen, and thought I'd felt, that I'd even imagined I could hear—a creaking and clatter, the squeal of old machinery, a century or more of utter blackness I could almost taste, like oily metal shavings—all of that packed to the rafters, bowing the walls, was, as my eyes adjusted, very slowly leaking away, that shed too flimsy to hold it all, and I could then make out a thin gray absence waiting there, which had an altogether different story.

Matthew Freeman

My First Insight Ever

It was a bird talking. And I was supposed to be on another level, one where people communicated and everything would be revealed to me. After they let me race around the women's ward I was called into the conference room to be interviewed by six shrinks and I went in smirking and intense and declared I'd found my object relation and the secret local newscaster they had sitting in deliberately tapped her toe and one doctor asked if I could fly and I said I felt like jumping out the window and taking off into the sky but that wasn't physically possible and he said that's a good start and I felt like a toddler again going from the pure illusion of love into the gnosis of the body of light. Write your obsessions, they say. I say lay down your miracles.

Diane Thiel

Field Notes from the Biolayer

It seems to require extreme conditions. Some do listen to the early alarms, but many will ignore all evidence until the water rises above their heads. As the virus sweeps, and they are forced to rely on the virtual world, some begin to realize what they had been missing, how much they miss touch, the sound of voices and music not filtered through machines. We have always found the music to be curious, the way they use it to connect, the way some sing to get through things. Though I have seen enough not to be naive, the possibilities are staggering. More are recognizing the way their world is connected within and also beyond—the rivers, the oceans, the air—the lovely layer that makes their existence possible.

Diane Thiel

Assimilation

Trying to write something about Borges and his dystopian purifiers, but living a few different realities at once, I keep thinking about the Borg.

After the screen, their image persists, the implants, maturation chambers, the hive so alien and familiar.
The perfection.

I wanted the poem to be funny, wry at least, carry its own kind of meta-resistance, but as I find myself saying out loud in the house, There is nothing funny about the Borg.

My twelve-year-old, as usual, pulls me out of that futile spiral, pointing out, Well, it's funny that they always say the same thing.
They do—despite all that math, all those letters, consuming all those libraries of information, all those possible ways of solving problems.
It is funny, but also terrifying to always hear the same thing.

Matthew Freeman

January Song

I stole something from some gangsters.
I can't remember what it was but I'm pretty sure they're out to get me now.
I tried hiding at my parents' house but there was just a vacant lot there. I got the feeling they're dead.
I asked my girlfriend if I could crash on her floor.
"I'm not your girlfriend," she said. "That was thirty years ago."

Maybe if I gave back what I stole everything would be cool again.
I go stumbling around my room but it looks like I need everything I have.
Maybe if I open a window I'll get an idea.

Oh, whoever this is, please have a heart.
I got thirteen teeth pulled in one sitting.
I mean, they were bringing in people just to see it done.
And the country's being ravaged by an evil pestilence.
Everywhere you go the winter's so discordant.
I'm not even convinced that was real snow falling the other day.
I keep going back to my origins, trying to figure out the plot.
And I might not even be the hero of my own story.

I'm being stripped of everything now. Take it, take it all away.
My dad drums some loud note in my head: don't get involved with gangsters.

Will Harmon

Bubble Bath

water rushes hard over his sharp-rock feet, then is lit up: bright, flash to complete toast, butter, cinnamon, domino sugar, domino mother, standing high, while you skitter lines on the dining table with a silver fork, life swaddled by big blankets of ooze, crude oil burning love letters into the pork belly—he shakes off his bones and dives into the sea. and all those people rush down, red and pink and her hair all ugly, shouting, come back up, it's electric, licking his little feet, she's making it all plastic and eyeballs rattle around in his head, yelping and crying and she sighs, she runs up to him, yelping and crying and on to him, years of pummeling waves, ripping you down into salt, and back into the sun.

SM Stubbs

Sister in Absentia

My sister has turned into a ghost. Not dead, merely a stranger we never see or hear from. No Christmas or birthday cards, no proof that she's still alive on this earth. I'm angry. So is everyone else. Still, blood will be blood and reliable news would be welcome. Last we heard she'd settled in Hawaii—then in May friends saw her eating dumplings in Memphis, Tennessee. I'm glad she's eating. If our minds decay at a constant rate, hers will have collapsed by now. Untethered, tangled, raw. Which means her slight appetite has likely shifted. When you see her? Stay away from her mouth.

SM Stubbs

The Ruined

We are wailing in time with the whine of exhaust fans outside our windows. We pound our chests, wailing; we're on our knees, wailing; we're prone on the bed, clutching the sheets to our eyes.
We've had enough death for now, and have fallen behind in our grieving.
We cry rivers that flood our collarbones; armadillos waltz across our ribs.
If we grew our own armor surely some would be spared. Please, teach us how to love everyone as much as they deserve. Teach us why life requires a count of those bodies we've held then lost, those dead rising on their way to being sounds we will only ever lift with our tongues.

Will Harmon

Mallory

the sun will always be hundreds of years in the sky in the summer day when we were born, in that pool-table filled bar, our mothers screaming and all holding hands, because they knew we would be ephemeral, like the flames of the torches that burn while we dance, splashing beer in each other's brightly-lit faces, and understanding nothing about our flailing bodies, but one day the world will turn, and the bitter factories of our lives will belch their smoke, and the clouds will yet again cover the sky, and we may touch the cold ground and cry, and the sun will be low, and it will be winter again.

Sheree La Puma

Something I Hate

Two boats outside my window with gillnets. Not that I know what that means (the nets) until you say they're illegal.
I watch the rise of the sea alive with promise, grow concerned for the dolphins that surf the waves as I sip my morning coffee/black.

That's a lie. I like cream/thick as foam washing in like a bad tourist along the Tijuana River. No one can swim in the ocean there. Or maybe they do.
Who knows what sickness comes in the dark of our own homes.
Yet we eat the fish, fish swimming through brown waste.

Did you know that dolphins can hold a grudge? Like you when I turn down the oysters you order for dinner.
There is not enough Tequila in the world to rinse decay off the tongue.
They found one dead, on the sands of Playa Encantada. Bottlenose crushed, a beautiful & terrible thing.

Something I hate.

Charles Rafferty

Oxbows

Curves in the river keep breaking off as it heads to the sea's address. They do their best to become what they are no longer, and we admire them for it, if only because of the mallard eggs, which their banks can hold without breaking. These lakes fill in with silt and cattails, transitioning over the decades to bog and pasture. Listen—the bell of some future dairy cow is clanking on the wind as it returns to a barn that is still a bunch of oak trees, their branches full of chattering finches on the way to someplace warm.

Charles Rafferty

Estate Sale

For example, a redwood became my late neighbor's picnic table, which his daughter set out on the lawn to display his fedoras. He had worn them as a young man, she said. Each hat had a bright feather stuck in the band. They didn't look like they came from the birds around here, and nobody wanted the hats. Even so, the picnic table got loaded into a truck before the dew burned off. The hats, of course, are part of the poem.

Caryn Mirriam-Goldberg

Mystery Street

I thought it was a gravel road lonely as a falling barn with slats ringing in the the wind while three wild horses wait for no one to return.

I thought its way would shine like red glass in sunlight, so full of darkness it would arrest me with the clarity of direction.

I didn't want it to be a crowded street in Calcutta with orange wings and screeching wheels, a dead end too, while fire burned in a bin, or for it to be a slope bundled in beige split levels in a St. Louis suburb.

If it was a street, why not one I knew, even if I carried such weight on my shoulders that I missed the red door that was always there?

If it was a mystery what I carried, why did I know where to step next?

Matthew Murrey

Paradise

Twenty years ago I set off to find her in fields, cities, libraries, woods, and museums.
Everywhere I went, I took my little notebook and scribbled down descriptions, impressions and clues. I was a regular private eye.

Every morning before work, I worked on them, and slowly they came—short and long, of love and despair, clever and simple, a few I still don't understand.
But she was always two steps ahead.

All these years later, I'm like that fellow in the Jewish tale who just walks away from his boring village and the drudgery of work, children and wife—sets off for Paradise. Halfway there, asleep at night, he gets turned around by an imp (or angel) so when he arrives right back where he started, he's not sure where the hell he is—heaven or home, earth or Paradise!

I often sit with my coffee in the morning—after writing in our sleeping house, after making breakfast and lunches for my two boys, after looking at my wife's gentle chin—and stare out the window, without speaking or writing.
What would I say? How would I put it into words?

Karen June Olson

Tapestry

My granddaughter rocks her body to rhythms in my voice and to stories I tell her that were whispered in my ears. Once and happily, I say

and then there are times I forget she is not mine but of mine, a simple mistake if I call her by her mother's name, the same slip my grandmother made with me. This tricked-up memory of mothering on occasion can make my breasts ache.

What I know about love floats on periphery; a grandmother collects rainwater in a soup pot to soften a child's hair, a tangle of strings, comb's careful part, slow twist of braids, a simple weave.

Karen June Olson

Summer in a Jar

Yesterday I followed a feeling as if it were a map, a wind sweetened by yellow clover winning the field, where my mother as her mother before, planted seeds by careful measures timed by the first quarter of a new moon.

I resisted work they claimed ritual, clearing gardens choked with purslane and chicory, our reddened skin brushed by wings of bees, hours repeating what was already said.

The days we'd dropped cloves of garlic, sprigs of dill, cucumbers, and boiling brine into jars, how windows closed with steam. Their songs about summer in a jar.

Now rain draws me out into a wet yard arms full of houseplants drunk with winter's gloom, to see what is imperceptible, a lift of leaves amid the wash—how my arms want to reach skyward.

Matthew Murrey

Turning Ghost

In the high school library two kids at a computer said they missed being kids.
I was kneeling, helping with Word, and looked up at them, seniors, young. "I didn't have to worry about anything back then," she said.
He agreed. I was middle-aged back in the days they were longing for.
I too have longed for days long gone—biking home in Chicago after work with a day-game in late innings in one headphone. Or one evening when I was a kid and smelled winter at the end of October, and knew.
My friend Steve told me of a cramped bar in Iowa City where he used to go to hear Greg Brown singing his lush grit before he got famous, before he got old and his gorgeous rasp went all to shit.
Wasn't there a hero who journeyed to the underworld and had to endure ghosts crowding the gate, desperate for any shred of what was? Sometimes my neck hurts and won't twist as it should. Sometimes I get dizzy and feel sick if I stand up too fast. Forward, forward, forward—this body of mine has no say in the matter, no matter how hard I try turning my head so I can look back.

Benjamin Nash

Agaves

The big agaves died in the snow, they have a touch of blue in them like
I see in my face and sky on a cold day,
in my blue jeans, in the faces of those that leave us, it would be nice if one of them had this cowbell that my grandfather put on one of the white cows to find them in the pines,
that we could hear them, this little boy that died from abuse in an apartment near me last week, that he,
the agaves
could come back, that this bougainvillea that belonged to my mother would bloom pink again this spring.

Benjamin Nash

Candle

In this long life we live, in the next one a nice person will burn like this flame in a white candle,
in a dark world, in a house of ice without power it is a yellow light in a white skull on the table made in a high school woodshop class and sitting on a pane of glass, in Posada's drawings, in the white wax with the blue flowers on it when it is 10 degrees outside with snow on the ground in blue light when we know someone will die in the night cold and go on, in this other place sharing their light like this small Day of the Dead candle that I bought in the grocery store because I thought it was pretty and it did not cost much money.